Improve Ventilation of Care Settings & Upgrade Respiratory Personal Protective Equipment

In support of front-line health care workers, we write to urge the UK Government and its devolved administrations to take all necessary precautions to mitigate airborne transmission of SARS-CoV-2 in health care settings.

Health and social care staff are “back in the eye of the storm” according to NHS England’s chief executive Simon Stevens. We are in the middle of COVID-19’s second wave, significantly impacted by a new coronavirus variant, which is reportedly 56% more transmissible.¹ On Tuesday 29th of December 2020, 21,787 people were being treated for the virus in hospitals in England, surpassing the first wave’s peak of 18,974 in April.² This number is expected to climb further and necessitates every effort to protect NHS staff from the virus.

Healthcare workers (HCWs) are on average 3-4 times more likely to contract SARS-CoV-2 than the general population, with risk varying upon their role in the NHS.³⁻⁵ Notably, while HCWs on regular wards are significantly more likely to become infected,^{4,6} intensive care unit (ICU) staff have ~50% lower risk despite working in an environment which was historically considered to be higher risk.⁷ This correlates with increased aerosol protection provided by higher-grade PPE and increased air exchanges in ITUs. In contrast, hospital wards where infectious coughing patients are also cared for, current guidance does not recommend the use of respiratory-protective PPE. Air exchange is not regulated in these settings either.

Currently, the Public Health England guidance on the type of PPE is categorised according to types of procedures carried out; deemed as either aerosol-generating or non-aerosol generating procedures. This is no longer compatible with what we now know.

The USA’s Centers for Disease Control and Transmission states that SARS-CoV-2 is most likely to be contracted by inhalation⁸, with one study suggesting that 80% of infections may be as a result of this route.⁹

It is now essential that healthcare workers have their PPE upgraded to protect against airborne transmission.¹⁰⁻¹² The inhalation of viral aerosols, whether the susceptible person is near the source or at more distant locations are most effectively interrupted by a respiratory protection device, such as an N95 filtering face-piece respirator.⁹

A significant proportion of the NHS workforce is unavailable to help at this peak time owing to sickness and a need to self-isolate because of SARS-CoV-2. This adds to the already perilous situation of remaining staff being tired, overworked and prone to making errors. Not only are staff contracting SARS-CoV-2 in healthcare settings, but also patients admitted for reasons other than COVID-19 are acquiring it in hospital. In the first half of November, approximately 20% of hospital cases for SARS-CoV-2 had been acquired in hospitals.¹³

To mitigate the spread of SARS-CoV-2 in both staff and patients, and to take back control of the situation in our health care settings, we request the following actions:

1. Ensure immediate access to FFP3 masks for all staff working with confirmed or suspected Covid-19 patients and commission a review of national PPE guidance.
2. Ensure hospitals immediately increase natural ventilation as much as possible in all clinical settings where current standard requirements are not currently met.

We implore that these recommendations are implemented across the UK as soon as possible. Mass vaccination and its impacts on rates of transmission will take time to take effect. It is therefore imperative to maximise science-based preventative measures towards aerosol/airborne transmission in addition to standard droplet precautions in health care settings now.

Yours sincerely,
